Seventy-five Years of Legal Education at Washington University

The Hope of the Founders

When Washington University was granted its charter in 1853, the Reverend W. G. Eliot, for whom it was first named Eliot Seminary, expressed this hope for the University and the West it was to serve:

"The safety of the Republic depends upon transplanting the best institutions of the older states to the more fertile soil of the West, where distinctively American ideas must ultimately have their freest development."

Certainly one of the most distinctively American ideas—and peculiarly related to the safety of the Republic—was the idea that ours was a government of laws and not of men. The important role of the legal profession throughout our national history in enunciating and fostering this ideal was neither unknown to the scholarly Dr. Eliot and his associates, nor was its significance unappreciated by them. They were well aware that more than half of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and of the members of the Constitutional Convention, had been lawyers and that the legal profession had already furnished by far the greater number of presidents, governors, legislators, diplomats, and other high officials in our national and state governments. They foresaw, if our distinctively American idea of government was to survive and be strengthened, that the legal profession would have to continue to furnish by far the greater number of our public officers. Nor were the founders of the University unaware that every lawyer is both advocate and officer of the court, so that, in protecting the interests of his client, the private practitioner, together with his ever present adversary, shapes and molds the system of stable yet flexible law without which civil society cannot exist. With this historical and philosophical perspective, it was only natural that Dr. Eliot and his colleagues made the establishment of a school of law one of their first concerns.

Plans to build a school of law to provide a high level of training for lawyers and future statesmen were formed almost at once after the establishment of the general departments of the University. These plans were interrupted by the outbreak of the Civil War, but were kept alive by Dr. Eliot himself; and in 1867 they bore fruit. In that year the University opened its Law School—first known as the St. Louis Law School—and admitted its first class.

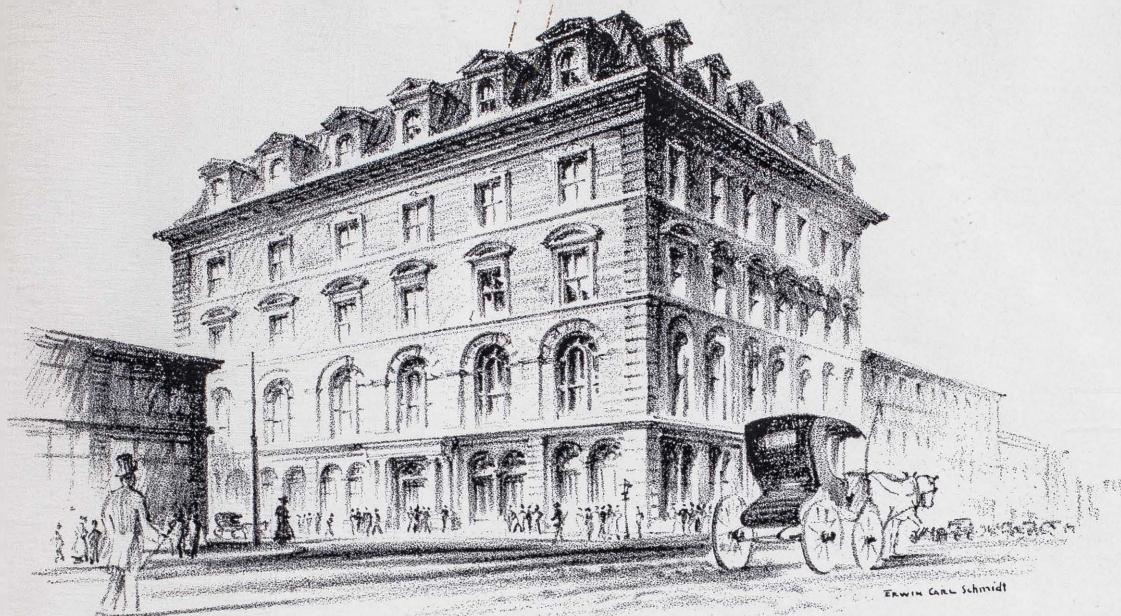

Legal Education Before 1867

Up until this time the prevalent, though not the universal, way to become admitted to the Bar was to serve as a clerk in a lawyer's office, "read law" under his supervision, and pass an oral examination before the local court which had power to admit to the Bar. This method had many of the merits of any apprentice system. Had high standards been enforced and made uniform by centralizing the power to admit in a single agency, such as the supreme court, "reading law" might have developed into a fairly satisfactory system of legal training. As it was, the training was extremely uneven, varying with the time, capacity, and interest of the individual lawyers and judges; and thus the type of training provided in the few existing law schools had begun to attract attention and was thought to be superior.

For the most part the early law schools had no university connections—or only very tenuous ones. Their faculties were not made up of persons whose principal occupation was teaching, but of active members of the Bench and Bar. Yet these schools represented a distinct advance in that they substituted regular lectures, topically arranged, for the usually haphazard reading of law in a lawyer's office and tended to place the task of instruction in those members of the profession with the greatest capacity and interest.

The Beginning

Since there had not yet developed in this country a corps of professional teachers of law, the University's School of Law at first followed the general pattern of the earlier schools. The faculty consisted of a dean and four professors, all of whom were active lawyers or judges, who at first received no compensation. Instruction was necessarily given at a time when the professors were not busy in their offices or in court—from four until six o'clock every week-day afternoon except Saturday. This schedule allowed the students to serve as law clerks during the greater part of each working day and consequently much of the apprentice system remained. But the School began with definite University support and the hope of developing a true university tradition, with salaried professors devoting their entire time to teaching and counselling students, and to research and writing.

From the start the Law School was able to secure the services of distinguished men. Henry Hitchcock, the first dean, was an able teacher and practitioner and an outstanding legal scholar. He later became president of the American Bar Association. Other members of the faculty were Samuel Treat, a well-known federal judge, Nathaniel Holmes, a judge of the Supreme Court of Missouri, John D. S. Dryden, a former judge of the same court, and Albert Todd, a leader at the St. Louis Bar.

In comparison with the standards of the day the entrance and graduation requirements were high. To be eligible for admission to the new School the student must be nineteen years of age, "be of good moral character", and be possessed of a "good English education". The first class numbered eleven. School was conducted for six months of the year; and the completion of two terms, and the passing of a comprehensive examination given by a Committee of The Bar, led to the degree of Bachelor of Laws.

Progress

Although the School was launched under these favorable auspices, many difficult years lay ahead. The School had no endowment except in the men who gave unstintingly of their time to provide instruction; it had no building of its own and was literally driven from pillar to post, as the number of its successive homes bears witness; it had no library save only as its faculty, alumni, and friends supplemented the few purchases of books the School made from its meager funds.

But the faith of those interested in the Law School was strong. They held firm to the conviction that it had an important mission in this great mid-western valley. To Dean Hitchcock the success of the Law School was a major goal in life. Through a gift from his wife he secured the first real improvement in the School's financial position. This gift, together with additional funds provided through the personal generosity of certain directors of the University, formed the School's first endowment. Yet for a long time the endowment remained too small for the School to embark on the broad educational program envisaged by Dean Hitchcock and his colleagues.

Gradually the situation improved. Enterprising alumni stimulated by the late Marion C. Early, class of '94, raised a fund by subscription and purchased for the School a working library originally established to serve a downtown law-office building. Gifts of money to increase the meager endowment of the School were made from time to time by friends of the Law School, including alumni and part-time teachers. In 1936 the segregated general endowment of the School was enlarged through the personal generosity of certain friends of the University. These funds, together with the revenues allocated to the School of Law by the University, enabled the School to expand its faculty to nine full-time members in 1939. Since then the war has compelled a readjustment of the School's program, and the number of full-time faculty members has been reduced to six. This change has been accomplished by a reduction in the number of subjects offered rather than by any relaxation of standards. The policy of retaining a sound instructional balance between full-time teachers and those engaged in the active practice has been consistently adhered to. At present the School has on its faculty five practicing lawyers, one of whom is a former judge, in addition to the six full-time instructors.

In 1922 the Law School was housed in its present home, January Hall, a gift of Mrs. Robert S. Brookings, in memory of her mother, Grace Vallé January. Two of the professorships, the Madill professorship of contracts and the Cole professorship of law have been partially endowed; and some loan funds and scholarships have been established for deserving and worthy students. School has attained high standards of scholarship and engages in functions and activities in keeping with the best traditions of American university law schools.

Yet the true wealth of the School is not in its brick or mortar, or its books, or its endowment. The true wealth of the School is in its men:—the succession of deans who guided its destinies and the members of its faculty, student body, alumni and the Bar, who founded traditions worthy of the legal profession. Nor can even the history of the School, briefly sketched thus far, be told fully without an account of these men and the way they faced and met its problems. And of these, many of the deans left a lasting impression on the School.

Earlier Deans: Henry Hitchcock

No better selection than Henry Hitchcock could have been made to start a law school at a time when the very idea of law schools was new, especially to the West. Behind him Hitchcock had the tradition of the jurist, for his father had been a Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Alabama, and the tradition of a classical scholar, for he had been a teacher of classics before entering the practice of law. Himself an eminently successful practitioner, he conceived the aim of the Law School to be the attraction of "young men who really desire to study jurisprudence and not merely to be admitted to the Bar."

After he had been dean for three years, Hitchcock was forced to resign because of ill health; and George M. Stewart was appointed acting dean. A year later Hitchcock's health was sufficiently improved to permit him to accept appointment as provost, a newly-created position involving financial management of the School. Stewart was then made permanent dean, but it was the influence of Hitchcock which dominated.

From the outset Dean Hitchcock recognized the School's need for full-time teachers so that the curriculum could be enriched and broadened; and it was through his efforts that funds were made available to secure the first full-time salaried professor, William G. Hammond, who became dean in 1881.

William G. Hammond

Dean Hammond, who was characterized at the time by a high source as the "most eminent authority in America on the history of the common law", was a graduate of Amherst and studied law and history in Europe for three years after his graduation from college. He came to Washington University from the University of Iowa, whose law school he had founded. Dean Hammond was a man of broad vision whose chief interest lay in legal education. Since he could devote his entire time and energies to the School, he made possible morning as well as afternoon classes, a richer curriculum, and more intimate faculty-student relations.

With the increase in the number of law schools, the prevailing low standards of admission to the Bar were criticized by law teachers and judges and lawyers alike. A strong movement developed to raise the standards of bar admission and Dean Hammond was one of its leaders. Indeed, his reports to the American Bar Association, as chairman of its committee to investigate the problem, were prophetic of the changes in bar standards which have since occurred.

William Samuel Curtis

Upon Hammond's death, he was succeeded as dean by William Samuel Curtis, a graduate both in liberal arts and in law of Washington University, who came to the Law School from Omaha, where he had been practicing law. Acquainted as he was with the educational philosophy of Hammond, Dean Curtis carried on the struggle for higher standards of legal training; but his efforts were now mainly directed to another aspect of the problem — the standardizing and accrediting of the law schools. He was instrumental in forming the Association of American Law Schools, of which the Washington University School of Law was a charter member. It was during the administration of Dean Curtis, and largely as the result of his influence, that the Law School's course was increased from two to three years.

Later Deans

The prestige of the Law School was preserved and enlarged by the succession of able men who carried on the traditions of their predecessors. Esteem of the Bar was maintained by men of the type of Richard L. Goode, who succeeded Curtis as dean in 1915. Goode, a man of high cultural attainments, had served on the St. Louis Court of Appeals for more than a decade before becoming dean. In 1919 he left the School to serve as a judge on the Supreme Court of Missouri for over a year but returned thereafter to serve again as dean until 1926.

Professor Tyrrell Williams whose 25th year of service was recently celebrated and who served as Acting Dean on several occasions.

During the time that Goode served on the Missouri Supreme Court, the affairs of the school were administered by Professor Tyrrell Williams, a graduate of the Law School and today still a full-time member of the faculty, who served as acting dean, as in fact he served on other later occasions. Never willing to accept the permanent deanship because of his greater interest in the class-room and student fellowship, Professor Williams nevertheless must be counted among those who have made a definite mark in the progress of the School. It was during his first service as acting dean, and largely as the result of his labors, that the present two years of college work as a prerequisite to admission to the Law School was adopted; and, quite aside from his administrative labors, his effective class-room presentation, and even more his sympathetic interest in students and alumni, have won him a secure place in the history and traditions of the School.

Dean Goode was succeeded in 1927 by William G. Hale, a graduate of the Harvard Law School and an able and experienced educator, who came to this School from the University of Oregon. Dean Hale resigned in 1930, after having done much to raise even higher the standards of the School and enlarge its library facilities, to accept the deanship of the University of Southern California School of Law. A worthy successor to Dean Hale was found among the members of the Law School faculty in Wiley Rutledge, who served the School well, widening its influence among both the Bar and the teachers of law in other law schools. Dean Rutledge, now a member of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, resigned in 1935 to become the dean of the school of law of the University of Iowa, and was succeeded by Joseph A. McClain, Jr.

The Law School's program had been expanding and improving steadily. It was during Dean McClain's administration that the number of full-time faculty members was enlarged to nine, the School's library greatly added to, and its endowment increased. A four year curriculum was established and the student body reached one hundred sixty-eight in number during this period. The war, though, has since compelled a discontinuance of the four year curriculum for the duration and caused a drastic decline in Law School enrollment. Dean McClain not only continued the high level of scholarship but, both by example and precept, gave demonstration of Dr. Eliot's hope that the Law School should train men for public service as well as for the private practice of law.

Upon Dean McClain's resignation in August of this year to engage in practice of law in St. Louis, Professor Warner Fuller, a member of the faculty, was appointed, and is now serving as acting dean. Professor Fuller, a graduate of the University of Oregon, and of the school of law of Yale University, practiced law in San Francisco before he entered law teaching at Duke University, from which institution he came to Washington University in 1936.

The Alumni and Members of the Bar

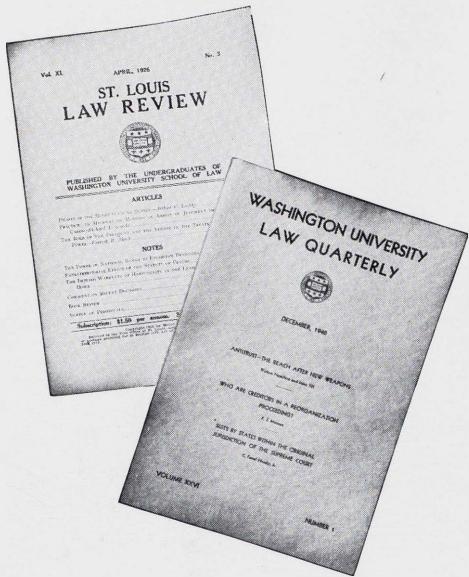

It was not unusual that the Law School should initially have been very much the product of the members of the Bar, and it is not unusual that its alumni should be loyal to it in spirit and deed. The gifts of time, books, and money of the alumni and other members of the Bar have already been recorded, and their value to the School cannot be minimized. Yet, of great service to the School—and believed to be unusual among law schools—have been the direct and continuous activities of the alumni and members of the Bar in furthering certain important school functions: the Practice Court and Law Quarterly.

The Practice Court

As early as 1867 a moot court was established to provide students, in competition with their fellows, with training in research and preparation of written briefs and oral argument before appellate courts. Interest in these contests was stimulated through the publication of student briefs in "The Moot Court Record", volumes of which are preserved in the library.

The Practice Court in session in the Civil Courts Building in St. Louis, Hon. John W. Calhoun of the Law School Faculty presiding.

The moot court was superseeded by a practice, or trial, court. Here, training is given in drafting pleadings, arguments on motions and demurrers, the presentation of cases through the examination of witnesses, and argument before juries. At present the practice court is presided over by Judge John W. Calhoun, who has had many years' experience at the Bar and on the Bench.

Student interest in the court may be attributed in large measure to its support by alumni and members of the Bench and Bar, who frequently assist the presiding judge. Members of the Bench make their courtrooms available for the semi-final and final trials and preside over them. Members of the Bar sit at these trials to judge the relative merits of the student lawyers and award prizes. In no small degree does the trial court contribute to the thorough training of lawyers at Washington University.

The Law Quarterly

Many law schools maintain law reviews to develop student proficiency in legal research and accuracy in expression. More than a quarter of a century ago, this Law School established such a journal, first known as the St. Louis Law Review and now known as the Washington University Law Quarterly. As is customary in publications of its kind, the Quarterly contains leading articles by legal scholars and practitioners, student comments on recent decisions, more ambitious critical notes on legal subjects, and reviews of current legal books and treatises. The student contributions are prepared under faculty supervision.

The Quarterly is essentially a student project and possesses those values derived from cooperative effort. A board of editors of twelve to fifteen students is selected annually from among those who have excelled in interest and ability. All students, whether on the board of editors or not, are encouraged to write for the Quarterly and profit from the training. The members of the editorial board not only prepare material for publication and edit other students' essays, but also put out the Quarterly and solicit leading articles. Among the distinguished contributors of leading articles have been: Associate Justice Harlan F. Stone of the United States Supreme Court, Charles Nagel, a member of President Taft's cabinet, United States Senator George Wharton Pepper, Dean Roscoe Pound of the Harvard Law School, Judge Charles E. Clark of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Dwight F. Davis, former governor general of the Philippines, and W. S. Holdsworth, the noted legal historian and professor of law at Oxford University.

But again the School's alumni make a contribution believed to be unique. Former editors and other alumni organized a Law Quarterly Advisory Board. This board regularly reads each issue and meets with the students to discuss and criticize their contributions. This provides a stimulus to student proficiency that has no substitute.

The Law Library

The School's history and achievements are reflected in the development of its library, for a library is the heart of a law school. Dr. Eliot may be regarded as the founder of the library, since his generous gifts supplied its first volumes. In 1871 the members of the faculty themselves purchased some additional books. The personal law libraries of several friends of the School were donated, but the greatest single addition was the purchase in 1903 by members of the Bar of a working library originally established to serve a downtown building. Thereafter several endowments were established, including that given in memory of Henry D. Estabrook, class of '76, by his daughter. But despite the welcome assistance these gifts furnished, the necessary continued expansion of the library would not have been possible without support from general funds of the University.

Thus Washington University's law library is the result of the indefatigable energy and vision of many friends, who have built up in seventy-five years a collection of over fifty-five thousand volumes. It now contains practically every standard set of English and American reports, a wealth of legal and related treatises, and a valuable collection of state and federal statutes. Through special gifts and bequests it has received many such rare and valuable volumes as a first-edition of Blackstone's Commentaries, the original Kirby Connecticut reports, and a set of American reprints of English law reports bearing the signature of Chief Justice John Marshall.

The News Letter

The News letter which is published by the Law School first appeared in 1937. Although a comparative newcomer, it has won a place for itself among law school institutions. It is published four times a year and contains general news of the School itself, the activities of the faculty and students, and items of interest concerning the alumni. As a consequence of its alumni personals it promises to become an important medium by which graduates of the School may be kept informed of the activities of former classmates and other alumni. The News letter is sent without charge to graduates of the School, its friends and to other schools, colleges, and libraries.

Legal Education and the Future

The first three-quarters of a century of the School of Law has drawn to a close in an era of great change. Social and economic institutions are being shattered or altered by the impact of dynamic forces. The legal profession will not be unaffected. Dim indications of probable future trends may be perceived. The enormously increased degree of specialization in industry is finding its counterpart in the practice of law. Specialization is more and more becoming the order of the day. It has been one of the most significant developments in modern practice of the law. Then, too, government participation in the affairs of man on a hitherto undreamed of scale has produced a bewildering array of new administrative and governmental agencies with many attendant problems of practice and procedure. Provision must be made to meet these and other changing demands on the legal profession. Lawyers must be capable of fitting into the altered scene and the law schools of the country will be expected to provide the necessary training. Great flexibility and adaptability in legal education will be required. Traditional patterns inevitably will be recast and modified. Already the School of Law of Washington University has been a pioneer among American law schools in shaping its curriculum to the needs of a changing world. Its traditional adaptability to the requirements of the times, together with its adherence to sound but progressive educational principles, promises that it will meet and satisfy the present and future needs of this great mid-western area.
